

Destinys Hand

It was a time of unparalleled genetic breakthroughs; of experimentation, replication, and cloning. A time when science set its sight not on the sheep, but the shepherd. In this brave new world, the distinction between creator and created faded to memory, ethics was a liability to the almighty bottom line, and the unthinkable became reality. An excerpt: The child in the picture looked older than seven, though pale and willowy. She had short dark hair, cut just below the ears and straight across her forehead. And that smile . . . A tear formed before she could stop it. Angela wasn't looking at a hellish experiment, but at a person. The smile is what did it. Not the toothy grin one might expect, but a haunting Mona-Lisa smirk all lips, no teeth revealing the uniqueness of her exquisite beauty. Angela smiled in return, imagining what the child might be thinking: Neener neener. I know something you don't and I'm not gonna tell. She wiped away the tear. What did I expect? Angela whispered. Some kind of monster? She's so young, so pretty, so perfect . . . My God, Melissa, what have they done to you?
